

What is a divorce?

A divorce is the official recognition of the end of a marriage.

The only legal requirement for applying for a divorce is the 'irretrievable breakdown' of the marriage. The court does not take into account who is at fault for the marriage ending. It is only necessary to prove that you and your spouse have been separated for 12 months with no likelihood of getting back together.

Once your divorce is finalised, you can remarry.

Divorce is separate from property settlement, parenting matters, and child support/maintenance matters, although you do not have to wait for a divorce before dealing with these other issues.

You should get legal advice before applying for a divorce.

How do I apply for a divorce?

How do I get a divorce?

When applying for a divorce, your former spouse doesn't have to agree to the divorce.

To apply for a divorce in the Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia, you or your former spouse must:

- be an Australian citizen; or
- live in Australia and regard it your permanent home; or
- normally live in Australia and have lived here for at least 12 months before applying for a divorce; and
- have been separated for 12 months.

You can still apply for a divorce if you were married overseas, or if you don't know where your former spouse currently is, as long as you live in Australia.

What if we have children?

If you and your former spouse have children under 18 (or children that were treated as members of your family during the relationship), then the court will need to make sure that proper arrangements have been made for the children before granting you a divorce.

The court will want to know things like:

- where the children currently live.
- how the children are financially supported.
- about their health and education.
- how they will continue to maintain a relationship with both parents and other important people in their lives.

It is not necessary to have parenting orders before applying for a divorce, but you will need to provide details to the court about the children's current circumstances and if you plan to make any changes to their circumstances.

What if we have gotten back together or reconciled?

After you separate, you and your spouse can get back together for up to 3 months without restarting the 12-month separation period required to apply for a divorce.

For example, if you're separated for 5 months, get back together for almost 3 months and then separate again for 4 months, you'll be considered to be separated for a total of 12 months. But, if you were back together for 4 months and separated again, your separation period will restart, and you will need to be separated for a further 12 months.

What if we have continued to live in the same home after separation?

The court will consider you have separated once the marriage has broken down 'irretrievably' and there is no prospect of you and your former spouse getting back together.

If you and your former spouse stayed living together after separation but had separate lives, this is called 'separation under the one roof'.

You will need to prove to the court that you were, in fact, separated under the one roof.

The court will consider whether:

- you sleep in the same bed;
- you and your former spouse have a sexual relationship;
- how you share meals and domestic duties in a different way to when you were married;
- you share money and bank accounts;
- your family and friends think of you as separated;
- you socialise or go out together.

The court will consider all these matters in the context of your situation to determine if you were separated or not.

Can I apply for a divorce by myself?

You can apply together for a divorce (joint application) or on your own (sole application). If making a sole application, you must 'serve' the other person with the divorce application. This means giving the other person the application and other relevant documents, so they know about the court proceedings. You can't serve your former spouse personally, but you can:

- ask a friend or family member to do it.
- pay for a professional process server to do it.
- post the divorce paperwork to them (but your former spouse will be required to post a document back to you acknowledging that they have received your divorce paperwork).

In all the above circumstances, you must complete certain court forms proving to the court the other person has been 'served'.

What if I don't know where my former spouse is or if there is a domestic violence order?

In certain circumstances, the court may still grant you a divorce if you are unable to serve your spouse. The court may allow you to serve your spouse in a different way other than personal service, for example, by emailing a copy of the divorce application to your former spouse. This is called 'substituted' service because you are substituting an alternative method for the normal process. The court usually expects you to make all reasonable efforts to locate and serve your spouse, but in some circumstances, they may excuse you from the requirement to serve the other party and this is called 'dispensing' with the need for service.

Do I have to tell the other party my address or contact details?

If you have safety concerns or are in fear of your spouse knowing your whereabouts, you do not have to disclose your address or contact information, but you will still need to provide an alternate address on your divorce application. This could be a post office box, an email address or friend or relative's address.

Is there a fee?

You will have to pay a court filing fee when applying for a divorce. You can apply to the court to have this fee reduced if you hold a government concession card or if you can prove you are experiencing financial hardship.

Do I need a copy of my marriage certificate?

Yes. If you do not have a copy, you will need to obtain one, unless exceptional circumstances apply. If your marriage certificate is not in English, you will need to have it translated through a qualified interpreter. In most cases, you will need to pay a fee for an interpreter to translate your certificate and complete a court form.

How do I apply for a divorce?

Applying for a divorce occurs online through the Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia. You can prepare the divorce papers and go to court yourself, or you can pay a solicitor to do it for you.

To apply online, you must first register for access to the Commonwealth Courts Portal. For more information, visit the Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia website.

The website contains do it yourself kits – this gives you a step-by-step guide to filing and serving your divorce application and information about how to complete your application and other forms.

If you are unable to apply for a divorce online, you should contact the court for further information. They can give you a hardcopy application form.

Do I have to attend court?

If there are no children under 18, you do not have to attend the divorce hearing unless you are directed by the Court to do so.

If there are children under 18, you are not required to attend the divorce hearing unless the Respondent objects.

The Court will direct you how to attend the hearing.

What happens during the divorce hearing?

If you meet all the requirements and the court is satisfied proper arrangements have been made for any children from the marriage, then your divorce will be granted, but is not yet final. The divorce order becomes final 1 month and 1 day after it's made, unless there's a good reason why the court shouldn't grant the divorce in that time. The date when the divorce order becomes final is the actual divorce date. The court can order a shorter waiting period between when the divorce is granted and when it becomes final in exceptional circumstances.

The court will issue you with a certificate of divorce which is available to download and print from the Commonwealth Courts Portal.

Are there any time limits?

Once your divorce is final there is a time limit of 12 months to apply to the court for property settlement or spousal maintenance.

What if a party disputes the divorce application?

A party may not want to get divorced if they don't consider the marriage is over or for religious or cultural reasons, but these are not sufficient reasons for opposing a divorce application. You can only oppose a divorce application in Australia if:

- you haven't been separated for 12 months (as alleged in the application); or
- there's no court jurisdiction (for example, if none of the parties live in Australia).

If your spouse files for a divorce and makes untruthful statements, then it is possible for you to respond to the divorce paperwork. For example, by clarifying the date of separation. However, a response is likely to have little effect on the proceedings if the court is satisfied that you have been separated for more than 12 months and all other grounds are met.

Should I change my Will?

In Queensland, divorce revokes that part of your Will that relates to your former spouse. After a divorce you should make a new Will to take into account your new circumstances. In fact, it is advisable to change your Will as soon as you separate to reflect your current wishes.

This factsheet includes general information only and is not a substitute for legal advice.